A Novel Bailway.

Mr. J. H. Haden, ex Engineer-in-Chief of the Ottoman Government, says an Eastern ex-(mag.) Too feet to foundary of Optimals Grant 947; thence | change, is said to be the inventor of a new kind of railway, which was invented to meet the needs in the East for the cheap, speedy and effective means of transporting men and munitions of war over a wild country, without the necessity of surveying, leveling and passing through the preliminary stages of ordinary railway building.

The new railway is a one-rail structure, and the line it represents requires neither sleepers nor foundations, the line running upon sevenfeet posts, 440 to the mile, the rolling stock upon it being shaped like an inverted V, designed upon the camel saddle principle. The carriages and engines fall upon either side like the panuiers on an animal's back, the wheels of the engines' trucks and carriages being horizontal, and gripping on each side of the rail. The material of the new railway is wholly of timber, the posts of the fence which constitutes the road are firmly sunk into the ground. Its hight rarely exceeds three feet, because it follows as nearly as possible the natural undulations of the country through which it passes, small hollows being graded out by varying the height of the posts.

The cars of the whole train form a continuous iron skeleton, on which the freight is carried in boxes constructed so as to be moveable without breaking bulk. The seats are turned down when troops and baggage are transported together, but turned up out of the way when freight only is carried. The empty freight boxes are arranged to do duty as ambulances palanquins, or pontoons. The engine, which weighs only four tons and is of one hundred herse power, does not require weight to give it tractive capacity, and can consequently, by means of its eight horizontal grip-wheels, actually climb a hill-side (grade one in ten) with a load of one hundred tons.

This novel structure has many features that suggest the trial of such a railroad on these Islands. It not only recommends itself by its adaptability, but by by its cheapness, and we see no good reason why such a structure would not be useful in places where transportation is not only expensive but almost impossible, from the broken nature of the country. From what we learn of the uneven character of the surface on some, if not all, of the islands of the Hawaiian group, and the very imperfect roads, we think it more than possible that the new railroad projected by Mr. Haden could be utilized. At all events, it might be worth the trouble of making inquiry on the part of our officials as to the practicablity of the thing,

He calogised the array, condemned Socialism, and recommended State protection for equation, and declared himself opposed to what laws should be passed touching the money question. It has always been a misfortune too, that members of Congress deferred too much to the dictation of the bankers, and hence much of the distress which has and still does prevail among the States. Within a few years past, the money question has of necessity become the absorbing topic of discussion among the people and politicians of all shades of belief. Some of the best minds in the States have been giving the financial question a good deal of thought, and at intervals have published their views, which at last have caused discussion in the public prints and on the hustings, until the people have become completely aroused, and the result is, that they have made the money question the leading topic, and in very many States the pivot question in the choice of members of Congress. In other words; the discussion on the money question has developed into such formidable proportions as to beget a third party called the National Party, which at present disputes the power of both the Demoeratic and Republican Parties to rule the country. Steamboating on the Murray.

[Special Correspondence of the Gazette.] After visiting the aboriginal blacks in the forests on the Murray, I took passage on a little steamer for a voyage down the river. After making secure a birth over the boiler, I came out to view my fellow passengers. A motley group they were. Cattle-men from the plains, sheep-men from the Australian interior, wine-men from the vineyards, hunters, trappers, travelers, commercial commission agents, and a host of wild looking fellows with unkept hair, their legs encased in buckskin leggings, leather vests, broad brimmed hats, and kangaroo skin caps, with a trusty calling in the forest wilds, indicating they were men all this, and yet they place their mascaline feet on their necks, and deprive them of any voice in the of few words and would bear no trifling.
